

Facilities UK

Wednesday 1 April 2009

News

Editorial Comment

Commuting is a UK pet hate

With the extreme weather conditions of earlier in the year long forgotten by fresh bursts of brilliant spring sunshine and the onset of summer with long days and the prospect of balmy nights, it is easy to see why the British public would love to change their work travelling arrangements.

Not surprising, a new survey shows that the British public state 'commuting and traffic' as their pet hate about working in an office.

According to the survey carried out by Remote Employment, Brits do not like working in an office because of their dreary commute each day, which brought in the highest vote of 39.25 per cent.

Next on the 'pet hate' Survey was Politics and office gossip with 32.58 per cent too many interruptions voted in at 13.46 per cent and expensive lunches only took 1.42 per cent. Thirteen per cent of the people survey said that they didn't like their boss!

Responding to the poll results, Paula Wynne, director of Remote Employment said: "The results of this survey show that the traditional office work culture is waking up to new ways of working! Remote working is a perfect way to maintain or increase business production and an employee's quality work life, while keeping costs down."

A handwritten signature in black ink that reads "Claire White".

Claire White, Editor
claire@markallengroup.co.uk